Trump's New Fossil Fuel Rollback Proposal Gets a Critic's Finger on the Trigger On September 10, President Trump released a draft of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) license renewal proposal for the Gulf Coast Energy Pipeline. This proposal, according to the National Wildlife Federation, "would open the floodgates to fossil fuel extraction, and massively increase pollution and greenhouse gas emissions." The proposal would allow for expanded development of controversial "fracking" and "hydraulic fracturing," or "fracking." Current federal regulations limit the amount of hydrocarbons that may be extracted via the use of "fracking." This proposal would allow for even higher extraction. Numerous scientific studies have raised grave concerns about the impact of "fracking" on ground water, aquifers, surface water, and the air we breathe. For example, a 2012 study conducted by the Environmental Defense Fund and other scientists found that the emission of volatile organic compounds by "fracking" is likely to exceed acceptable levels established by the federal Clean Air Act. "Fracking" is currently allowed only in a small number of counties in New York and Pennsylvania, due to federal regulatory agencies' concerns about the environmental impact of the practice. The National Wildlife Federation's Earthjustice colleague Kyle Zipperer issued a statement in response to the proposal: "The reckless expansion of 'fracking' constitutes an unprecedented assault on our climate and on our wildlife. The floodgates for destructive fossil fuel extraction on public lands will now be wide open. The Trump administration must reject this outrageous proposal. We must go to court to stop it."
