want. The History of Satellite Communicators Back in the 1960s, NASA deployed satellites in order to track and communicate with unmanned military vessels, vehicles and aircraft. There was also the need to send messages from the surface to the spacecraft through a relay, such as an operator atop an aircraft.
These were the forerunners of satellite communicators. Many of these communications satellites served dual functions. For example, the DF-21 Earth observation system, developed and operated by China, also carries a telemetry and telecommand system. It was the first military satellite that used voice communications.

Communicators at a glance Innovative technology since 1950s
Satellite communicators have evolved from military radios carried by tracked vehicles to those used by unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs). UAVs have also become more advanced and complex. The use of UAVs, or unmanned aerial vehicles, continues to expand, especially in the defense and security industry. On Aug. 8, the first commercial UAV to be launched by a private company landed on the firm's landing pad at its test facility in southern California. UAV technology, however, is on a steady upward trajectory. In the years ahead, we expect to see unmanned air vehicles have a dramatic impact on almost every aspect of the military and civilian world. At the dawn of the new millennium, a variety of different weapon systems began to use satellite communicators to communicate with each other. The Israel Defense Forces were among the first to employ satellite communicators to communicate with unmanned aerial vehicles. Satellites since 1960s In the 1960s, NASA deployed the Telstar communications satellite. It was the first manned satellite to provide worldwide television signals, including Japan, Europe, and the Middle East. It was the forerunner of a category of satellites known as geostationary communications satellites (GSCSs). It became the world's first international spacecraft to carry two transponders, making it the first commercial communications satellite to carry transponders. The term "satellite" was defined in an
